“ELDRIDGE CLEAVER GOES TO PYONGYANG, HANOI & PEKING: AFRO-ASIAN INTERNATIONALISM AND RADICAL ORIENTALISM” – WINTER 2014 LEFLER LECTURE

Professor Judy Tzu-Chun Wu delivered this winter’s Herbert P. Lefler Lecture last Monday, addressing themes of radical politics, orientalism, race and gender during the Vietnam Era. Prof. Wu, of Ohio State University, described the 1970 trip taken to Korea, China and North Vietnam by a delegation of American radicals led by Eldridge Cleaver of the Black Panther Party. These activists, Wu argued, saw East Asian Communism with a unique gaze, assuming a new form of “radical orientalism” that divided the world into a binary of forward-looking East and imperialist West. By presenting these viewpoints, Wu's lecture expanded the conventional narrative of the history of activism beyond a story of domestic movements centered on black-white race relations, into an international story of political inspiration.

During her visit, Prof. Wu also spoke with Prof. Harry Williams’ African-American History II and Junior Colloquium classes. Her monograph, Radicals on the Road: Internationalism, Orientalism, and Feminism During the Vietnam Era, was published in 2013 by the Cornell University Press and addresses these topics.

ALUMNI KUDOS

Anthony Klug ‘98:
I am now working for the teachers union. It was a difficult decision to leave the classroom and I miss it but feel it is well suited to my interests and presents me with opportunities for challenge and growth. Feels good to forward an agenda I believe in while helping educators—the angels on earth.

AMRITA PANDE PUBLIC TALK ON INDIAN SURROGACY

Professor Pande visited Carleton on Monday from the University of Cape Town to deliver a public talk, “‘It may be her eggs but it’s my sweat and blood:’ The Paradox of Womb Work in India.” Before a packed house, she described India’s growing industry of surrogate-mother clinics, where predominantly lower-class women are compensated for carrying the fetuses of couples from the first world. This “new form of outsourcing,” she argued, carries paradoxical implications because of its relationship to Indian culture. By gaining self-sufficiency through surrogacy, these women transform their fertility from something discouraged by the Indian government’s anti-natalist programs into something “productive.” At the same time, however, their status as mere vessels for babies of the first world reinforces racist and classist inequalities related to population control. Prof. Pande’s book, Caution! Brown Wombs at Work: Transnational Commercial Surrogacy in India, will be released this year, and will be the first ethnographic book on the Indian surrogacy industry.

1200TH ANNIVERSARY OF CHARLEMAGNE’S DEATH

On January 28, 2014, the 1200th anniversary of Charlemagne’s death, the History Department and friends celebrated with cake and refreshments. Professor Bill North read an excerpt on the end of Charlemagne’s life. On 28 January 814, Charlemagne, king of the Franks and emperor of the Romans, died at his palace complex at Aachen. As many of you know, Charlemagne was an immensely energetic ruler and pursued vigorously not only a strongly expansionist political and military agenda but also a developed religious and cultural program (funded in no small measure by his military conquests and imperial domains).
Andrew Ladner ’07 (History and English double major, European Studies concentration) is a member of Google’s Capitol Hill team in Washington, D.C. Andrew spends his days helping members of Congress and their staff wade through the ins and outs of Internet policy. He often reflects fondly on his time in Leighton Hall with his fellow History majors as he wends his way around the halls of Congress, especially when he finds himself in the Minnesota members’ offices (at least one of which has a Carleton pennant on its wall). Andrew encourages all current and future History majors interested in policy, politics, and the Internet to contact him; he’s always happy to chat about the possibilities offered by all three, and in hearing the latest on how campus is looking these days.

What is your comps topic?
My comps topic is morality in the Holocaust.

What is your dream job?
Underwater archaeologist. I always loved the idea of being underwater and discovering ancient stuff.

What has been your favorite history course at Carleton?
298 because it basically taught me what history is and how to do it. Plus, you can’t beat the Great Cat Massacre.

Who is your historical crush?
As cliche as it is, I have to say Winston Churchill. Just because of the sheer magnitude of his person and influence, but also because of the fascinating contradictions of his beliefs and career that sometimes get glossed over in favor of his quite remarkable achievements.

What historical period would you most like to visit?
Republican Rome. Since I was little I have been fascinated by Roman history and would love to experience it for myself.
